FRIG COLLECTION

We know where to go.

Small enough to anchor where others can't.

Faralya is a 20-metre ketch built in 2008, designed for the kind of coastline that rewards a smaller boat — narrow inlets, shallow coves, and harbours where larger yachts simply can't follow. She carries six guests in three cabins, each with its own bathroom, and a crew of three who know how to keep things simple and well-run.

On deck, the cockpit opens to an outdoor dining area shaded by a full tente, with teak underfoot and cushioned seating that wraps around a proper table. Forward, a second sun area gives you the kind of quiet that only comes from being at the bow, away from everything.

Below, the saloon is warm and finished in wood — a place that feels considered rather than decorated. Roller sails keep her moving under canvas when conditions allow. She's not trying to be the biggest thing in the bay. That's the point.

Twenty metres of teak, canvas shade, and a crew of three — enough to reach the coves that larger yachts pass by.

The saloon — warm wood, low light, and space enough to gather or retreat.

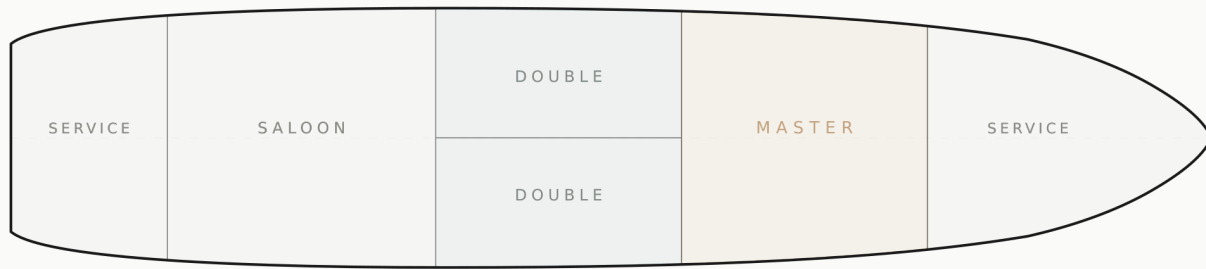

Each cabin has its own en-suite bathroom, air conditioning, and the quiet of a well-insulated hull.

LAYOUT

How the space works.

Faralya's layout keeps things clear: the master cabin sits to starboard amidships, wide and private with its own en-suite. Two double cabins forward share the bow section, each with a bathroom. The crew quarters are separate, with a galley that opens to the saloon and an aft cockpit that serves as the heart of daily life on board.
