FRIG COLLECTION

We know where to go.

Three decks to choose from, and no wrong answer.

Kayhan 4 is a 29-metre ketch built in 2012, designed around the idea that outdoor space matters as much as what's below deck. She carries three separate living areas above — aft dining with a wraparound bench and twin screens, a forward lounge under sail shade, and a foredeck scattered with cushions. Most evenings, everyone ends up somewhere different, and that's the point.

Below, five cabins accommodate ten guests. Two masters sit at opposite ends of the boat, each with double beds, en-suite bathrooms, minibars, and enough room to feel private. Two twin cabins and one double fill the centre. Every cabin has air conditioning, its own entertainment system, and a proper bathroom with hot water.

A crew of four runs the boat — cooking, anchoring, planning the next stop. She holds 12,000 litres of fresh water and carries a water maker, so there's never a sense of rationing, even on a longer route.

Three outdoor living areas — aft, midship, and bow — so ten guests never have to share the same view unless they want to.

The saloon — wood-detailed, with a U-shaped sofa, dining table, and entertainment system for quieter evenings.

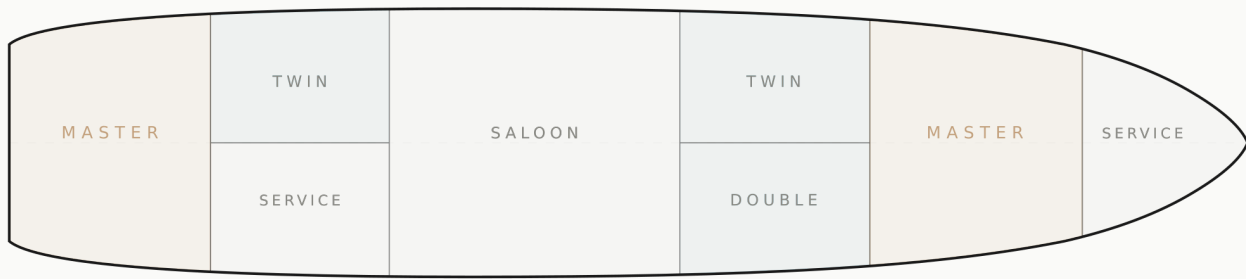

The aft master — double bed, en-suite, minibar, and a vanity table. A cabin that remembers it's also a room.

LAYOUT

How the space works.

Two master cabins bookend the guest accommodation — one aft, one forward — giving couples or families their own private ends of the boat. The double and twin cabins sit amidships, close to the saloon and galley. Above deck, the aft dining area seats everyone under a tente, while a second lounge forward offers a quieter alternative with its own seating.
